The Mountain World, 1962-3

Edited by MALCOLM BARNES

The new volume in this series is an advance even on its highly praised predecessor. For the first time eight plates in full colour are included as well as fifty-six in the usual high quality black and white. The text includes a great variety of stories, including some of rather unusual interest: balloon flights over the Alps and cave exploration under them. Among the many others, there are accounts of the British expeditions to the Stauning Alps of Greenland, and the Russo-British expedition to the Pamirs which resulted in the death of Wifrid Noyce. 64 plates 36s

SUMMIT CONFERENCE

"The way to enjoy the achievements of climbing to the full," said the Chairman, "is to leave nothing to chance. In the first place, we must have the best equipment. That means Viking as far as ropes are concerned. The range of Viking ropes covers every mountaineering requirement. They're made by the world's largest, most experienced producers of ropes — and rigorous testing at every stage of production guarantees the quality."

It was unanimously decided to equip with Viking.

(All climbing equipment used in the above photograph was supplied by Benjamin Edgington.)

The Freezing Point of Beards

At 25,700 ft. on Everest, the cold was so intense that this famous climber's beard was coated with ice. Yet his Grenfell parka still gave him perfect protection. High performance in high places makes Grenfell cloth the choice of most of the world's leading expeditions.

Four Against Everest
WOODROW WILSON SAYRE

The amazing story of the 1962 assault on the North Face of Everest

One cold afternoon in February, 1962, a small party of Americans led by Woodrow Wilson Sayre gathered at the Boston airport, bade their families goodbye, boarded a jet to India, and set off on one of the most incredible adventures of our time. Their goal: the first American conquest of Mt. Everest; their resources, a mere £3,500 of their own money. Their intended route: over the Napalese border into Chinese Communist Tibet, to attack Everests' North Face, attempted eight times but never conquered. Without official backing, without permission to enter Tibet, without Sherpas or other porters, and, incredibly, without oxygen, the little Sayre party accomplished one of the most astounding feats in the history of mountaineering.
