

Dr. Thorington, with much painstaking research, from all possible sources.

A century ago David Douglas probably was the first to climb a mountain in the Canadian Rocky Mountains. He named it Mt. Brown; close by, on the other side of the Athabaska Pass, was another that he named Mt. Hooker; nearly a century has passed before the latter has been conquered by Dr. Thorington.

Two whole chapters deal with the various accounts of the early travellers who penetrated into the wild mountainous region of Western Canada. The account of Athabaska Pass gives for the first time all available information collected from the letters and diaries of the fur-hunters and trappers, David Thompson of the North-West Company, David Douglas, Ross Cox, Henry Ross, and others. Excellent portraits of some of these are given, together with a map and facsimile of handwriting in one of Douglas's journals.

Dr. Thorington's book is delightfully written, the photographs are excellent, there is a good index, and numerous maps and appendices.

'Last night I dined at the Castle, Richmond, with the Alpine Club. We found a jolly party round William Longman the publisher, who is Vice-President of the Club; Anthony Trollope sitting next to him. Longman is a glorious fellow full of jokes and story, and beaming with humour. Trollope is also a good fellow modelled on Silenus, with a large black beard. There was a call for Trollope, and Silenus made a funny speech, assuring the Club that he was most desirous of becoming a member, but the qualification was difficult, and both time and flesh were against him. He added that, not very long since, in the city of Washington, a member of the U.S. Government asked him if it were true that a club of Englishmen existed, who held their meetings on the summits of the Alps. In my anxiety to support the credit of my country, I may have transgressed the strict limits of veracity, but I told him that what he had heard was quite true.'

'The land at the back of Stone Conduit Close was acquired by the first Earl of Burlington in 1687 from Sir Benjamin Maddox. It was at that time known from its area as "The Ten Acres Field,"<sup>1</sup> and may be identified with the ten acres of pasture which Maddox had included in his marriage settlement in 1664. At first this land seems to have been used as an extension of the gardens of Burlington House. Afterwards the third Earl built on a part of it the house at the end of Savile Row, which is now occupied by the Alpine Club, as a garden or tea-house, the interior decorations being in the same style as those of Burlington House itself. But ultimately the whole area was laid out for building under the Earl's direction between 1720 and 1733.'
